

A majority of the citizens of Wisconsin (myself included) greatly appreciate the protections against telemarketers afforded by our state law. Please don't interfere with our desire to be left alone. If marketers don't like that, they can always send offers in the mail. Then such offers can be handled on the consumer's timeframe, not the marketer's.

The peace and quiet that I have enjoyed since the introduction of Wisconsin's no-call law has been wonderful. To force less protection on Wisconsin citizens would be an affront to state's rights and a giant step backward in our citizens' desire to have a peaceful dinner without unnecessary and undesirable interruptions.

Nobody is forced to join the Wisconsin no-call list, we've chosen to let the telemarketers know that we have no desire to receive telephone solicitations. They should be happy to be provided a list of people who will not do business with them, and they can save their time and money.

Wisconsin's law has been such a success, perhaps the federal government can take lessons and bring your law up to our higher standards.